Well, when they get their license, that's all that they want to get, so I don't want it hastened. I don't want to make...I don't want it made too simple from the standpoint of those who are trying to persuade people to sign away their organs. I bet you-all would not agree to a bill that I would like to get passed which says that any body who has agreed to sign away his or her organs will have first shot at organs should he or she need a transplant. Would you be willing to agree with that? Would you? No. Because a lot of times poor people are going to sign away their organs but the ones who are going to need them are rich people or those with enough money to pay for it. You think if my kidney or my...if my liver went out on me, you think I can have it lined up in a week or a month where I'm going to get another liver, and I don't have any insurance and I don't have any money? No. We're not realistic and we're not practical when we deal with these things. I'm not talking about what Senator Thompson is trying to do with her bill. I'm touching on that, but I'm a step beyond that now too. And I look at all of these kind of programs and human beings are being reduced to the level of commodities. They are training nurses and doctors how to quickly talk to somebody who croaked in the hospital so that the family will be...feel an obligation to let them take this person's organs who no longer is here. So they come in. They all come in. They don't come in like they used to now looking like death, where the surgeon comes in with his head down and the nurses are in tow and everybody is dragging in, looking like all they need to do is start a dirge.

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: No. They dress in a...probably in bright-colored clothes. They come in with a perky smile, surgeon is drinking a cup of coffee, nurse is polishing her fingernails, and they make this just a very ordinary little thing and they say, oh, by the way, can we take the organs of this person, because everybody is doing it now. And the bereaved family interrupts its bereavement and its grief and say, oh, sure, take 'em, we don't have any use for 'em. Now, it may not be quite that cold, but I read the literature published by those who are trying to get these organs and they're training people how to go in and talk to these families so they'll feel like this is what they ought to do. Even in their time of
